GOG.com/store-page/Counter-Strike:-Global-Offensive/.Non-destructive testing is commonly used for detecting internal and external flaws and defects in equipment, structures and other components. Transmission and reflected gamma radiation are commonly used to detect flaws in materials. When Gamma or X-ray radiation passes through a given material, it interacts with atoms in the material. When the energy of the radiation is of a magnitude greater than the binding energy of the atom, the atom becomes excited. In a particular material, these excitations have a tendency to remain localized within the atomic lattice of the material. However, at the same time, high energy radiation provides a source of energy for the atoms in the material to become excited. This is the process of nuclear transmutation. When the energy of the radiation is of a magnitude less than the binding energy of the atom, the atom remains in a stable state. There are two types of gamma radiation: 1) induced and 2) spontaneous. Induced radiation is emitted by the atoms as the result of the nuclear transmutation process. Spontaneous radiation is emitted as a result of the nuclear decay process of the atomic nucleus. Induced radiation is normally in the form of X-rays with wavelengths in the range of about 0.01-10.0 microns. The wavelengths for X-rays are influenced by the atomic number of the element. For example, common elements include hydrogen (Z=1), helium (Z=2), carbon (Z=6), nitrogen (Z=7), neon (Z=10), etc. The wavelengths for different elements are shorter for elements with higher atomic numbers. Typical X-ray wavelengths are in the range of about 0.01-1.0 microns. For example, the commonly used wavelength range for medical radiology, X-ray medical imaging, is about 0.01-2.0 microns. Radiation scattering is due to the electromagnetic process of interaction between radiation and atomic nuclei of the material. Scattering is a function of wavelength, 648931e174
